Egg consumption and ovarian cancer risk in Chinese women. A case-control study of 166 incident ovarian cancer cases and 516 control subjects was carried out to evaluate the association between egg consumption and ovarian cancer risk in China. Compared with women with the lowest egg intake, those with higher egg intake had a significantly decreased risk of ovarian cancer (odds ratio [OR] for ≥ 5 eggs/day, 0.55; 95% confidence interval [CI], 0.32-0.96). This inverse association was observed among parous women (OR, 0.31; 95% CI, 0.14-0.68). No clear association was observed for egg consumption in pre- and perimenopausal women. Although the protective effect of egg consumption on ovarian cancer in Chinese women is modest, such an inverse association does exist.

Disturbance of energy metabolism in rat kidney after short-term exposure to ochratoxin A. Ochratoxin A (OTA) is a mycotoxin that is frequently encountered in foodstuffs, and has been shown to be nephrotoxic in laboratory animals. In this study, male rats were given a single oral dose of 0 (control), 0.8, 4.0, or 24.0 microg OTA/kg body weight. Animals were killed 24 h later, and left and right kidneys were prepared for morphological and biochemical studies. Histological examination of kidney tissue showed an increased incidence of degeneration and necrosis in the OTA-exposed animals, but this was observed only in rats exposed to 24.0 microg OTA/kg body weight. Mitochondria were also most severely affected in OTA-treated rats. OTA exposure resulted in the depletion of the adenine nucleotide levels in
